Annex 6: Daphne illustrative cases

The various projects shortly described here below are aimed to illustrate the kind of (very varied) work carried out with Daphne funding. They have been chosen also to illustrate various types of results, dissemination practices and possible impacts.

*Other (more detailed) illustrative cases can be found on the Daphne website at the address:

1. A project created a transnational website (including five country-specific sections) providing working and training tools for health professionals on how to deal with domestic violence. Thanks to the distribution of a site presentation card through the medical networks, and to its presentation at a conference with the participation of the Ministry of Public Health, journalists and the medical press, the website has reached a significant level of visibility in the country of the lead organisation. It has also been publicised in well-known medical journals. Publicising the website is indicated as one of the ten priority actions to be implemented within the expert group's report to the Minister of Public Health on the role of health professionals with regard to domestic violence.

2. Another project carried out a training programme for volunteers and trainers of telephone emergency services. In order to make volunteers and trainers better recognise early and hidden signs of violence, the programme focused on their individual perceptions/experiences and cultural representations of violence. Volunteers and trainers, having attended the training, re-read the data relating to the phone calls received in 1998 by telephone emergency services. As a consequence of their newly acquired ability to grasp hidden signs of violence, the statistics changed and the phone calls relating to violence against children and women jumped from 5% to 20% in the host country, and from 2% to 20% in a partner country. This is an indicator of the success of the training programme in improving helpline volunteers' ability to recognise early and hidden signs of violence, which assist them in dealing with an important aspect of the prevention of violence.

3. One project promoted co-operation with national public authorities and among NGOs working against trafficking in women both in the host countries and in the countries of origin. As a result, in three countries of origin, NGOs started working as focal points for national networks for many activities related to trafficking. They were able to give lectures throughout the countries concerned and to organise three national workshops on the issue with the participation of NGOs, various professionals and public authorities. They established contacts with the Ministry for Foreign Affairs in one of the receiving countries. Local TV and radio channels interviewed them. In two sending countries, national mailing lists on the issue were created and a research on sex business advertisements in newspapers was implemented. In the third country a project on safe sex for prostitutes and co-operation with the police were started.

4. Addressing the problems of gender and violence in schools, one project undertook to produce and distribute an educational package, consisting of an animated video and written materials. It conducted research on bullying and violence in schools and then through consultation with the EU and other partners, produced a script and storyboard for the video. The project has also conducted interviews on the issues with the 12-14 year-old target group. The end product, the video, presents an imaginary TV programme that visits schools and interviews students. The students are doing the programme and providing a voice-over for experiences of their schoolmates. As a result, the gender differences are exposed: boys and girls live in a different world. The project had, informally, involved its target group of young people in the video evaluation. They also undertook free distribution of the product to partners and other relevant organisations and agencies. EU partners arranged for dissemination in their countries. The video is shown at conferences and is part of a package sent to the specialist press. Other products included: a booklet to accompany the video, flyers, leaflets, postcard images from the video and a website that carries the information.

5. Another successful project dealt with domestic violence. It produced a training and information programme on CDs, for both professionals and victims of domestic violence in some EU countries, as experienced by migrant and ethnic minority women. Women victims of domestic violence (in refuges) of different nationalities were interviewed about their experiences with the perpetrators of violence, medical and social services and the police. Two CD-ROMs were produced and translated into minority language(s). One CD-ROM provides information for victims of domestic violence; and the other offers training and awareness raising for public service personnel, complete police training and interactive video scenes showing different methods of intervention. All the above are also published in a report form. The CDs were distributed to all relevant agencies and government departments, including all partner countries. The project reported that these had a very positive impact on victims seeking information and help, and for professionals looking for effective ways of dealing with domestic violence. The government in the host country is planning to produce an edition of 20,000 copies of both CD-ROMs. The EU partners have also approached their governments for support to produce of a national version of both CD-ROMs.
